Tolkyn Abdrashova, Grade 4 chemical analysis laboratory assistant at the Commissioning and Environmental Protection Department of CHPP-2 named after A.Zhakutov

In the energy sector, there are no random results – behind every figure lies the specialist's attention to detail, knowledge and personal responsibility. For Tolkyn Abdrashova, a Grade 4 chemical analysis laboratory assistant in the Commissioning and Environmental Protection Department of the A.Zhakutov CHPP-2, work is not just a profession, but a daily opportunity to grow, be of use to people and contribute to the stable operation of the plant.

Tolkyn works in the plant's production laboratory. She has only been in the industry for three years, but during this time the energy sector has become truly close to her heart. Every day brings new knowledge, new experience and a sense of professional growth.

As a child, she dreamed of becoming a journalist. She was drawn to the chance to work with words and tell stories. However, fate led her into the energy sector. Over time, she came to realize that here, too, she serves people. It's just that her contribution is measured not by publications, but by precise analyses and stable technical performance.

“I test the air in work areas and the equipment in production halls, and monitor the gas composition in the hydrogen cooling system for the generators,” says Tolkyn. These processes require the utmost precision and a deep understanding of the technological regime, as the safety and reliability of the plant’s operations depend directly on the quality of laboratory monitoring.

For her, the energy sector is a field of great responsibility and constant interest. She considers safety, quality and discipline to be the most important aspects of her work. A formal approach is not possible here: one must clearly understand one’s role in the overall production process and feel a personal stake in the outcome.

Tolkyn notes that patience, composure and respect for work are particularly valued in the profession. It is precisely these qualities that help one move forward with confidence and make decisions in situations of high responsibility.

She speaks warmly of her team – the commissioning and environmental protection unit. They are a close-knit group of highly qualified specialists, ready to support advice and share their experience. In such an atmosphere, it is easier to grow professionally and feel confident about the future.

Tolkyn considers the energy sector to be a prestigious and significant profession for the country. This industry ensures stability and comfort for millions of people, and realizing her part in this is a great honor for her.

She devotes her free time to her family, loves walks in nature and cherishes simple moments spent with her loved ones. Her guiding principle remains unchanged: honest work is a source of dignity.

For Tolkyn Abdrasheva, the energy sector is a path of responsibility, interest and continuous development, and most importantly, the feeling that her work helps people live in warmth and security.
